Strange bedfellows

Ten days before the House Assassinations Committee reported that President Kennedy's death probably resulted from a conspiracy that may have involved Jimmy Hoffa, Robert Boris published his documentary novel, "Blood Feud," drawing the same conclusions. "I spent a year and a library card finding out what it took the committee 2½ years and $5 million to discover," Boris says. He started out to write a book about the Teamsters and the Kennedy Administration, not the assassination. "But about six months into the research the connections became too disturbing to dismiss. It was an incestuous bed. The same names kept popping up all over. For example, Jack Ruby was a Teamster official in 1942 and involved in a Teamster murder."
